

FIT online

Want to train to look like a Greek god without going to a gym? Health and fitness Web sites might be the solution

ANIL PATRICK R.

It's raining like there is no tomorrow and you don't feel like letting go of your bed. But you are guilt-ridden, for your early morning session at the gym awaits you. You hate staggering to that place each day at some unearthly hour and the thought of bouncing up and down with all those people with perfect bodies and a tyrannical trainer puts you off mightily. "If only they would give me an exercise routine that fits me," you groan. And it's not your dimensions alone that you are worried about. You are trying to kick off your nicotine addiction. Hang on, help is close at hand. The Internet brings you a host of personal trainers and health counsellors. Worried about the costs that they charge? Relax. Most of the services are free. So why not turn down the health road?

Fit ware

If your question is about what these sites have to offer you, the answer is almost everything related to keeping fit. The most common tool that health sites offer is the fitness and diet scheduler.

This tool maps your workout and diet over a certain specified period set by you or them. And if you are trying to break the habit of sneaking off your schedule, this tidy tool helps you keep a record of how true you have been to it. These fitness reports are also available as graphs or assessment reports in most of these tools.

Many sites allow you to keep your health profile online. They provide you with an assessment of your health condition based on your profile and often assess your risk factor for various diseases as well. You can even consult experts on the site regarding your health queries. Most of them provide interactive calculators for almost every aspect of health and fitness. These calculators help you check a range of health-related issues, from checking your fitness level to finding out your risk for cancer.

Health first

One of India's premier hospital groups, Apollo, has a Web site devoted to health care. Check out www.apollolife.com and make use of their experience

Find it on digit interactive

Indiasites

New Indian sites

Sitemap

Masti.com, check out

Playware