

explore design

Product design is all around us yet we're completely oblivious to the ways in which these products affect our lives and what goes into creating them

Siddharth Parwatay

siddharth.parwatay@thinkdigit.com

Product design is not just about seemingly trivial objects. Take the blood sugar monitoring gadgets used by diabetics to your all important personal computer; they're also results of product design. So, like all great endeavours begin with a simple question that has many complex answers, let's ask ourself – what is design? Apart from the test book definition of design, there are a lot of schools of thought about design and the profession of product design. In an interesting talk on TED.com, celebrated designer Tim Brown urges designers to think big and questions whether design is just about putting an “attractive shell on a piece of technology, or making things more

