

What language do the kids speak these days?

The language of the internet can be strange and incomprehensible to the “outsiders” – that’s you. It is known as Engrish, and it means learning really well to write really bad. An easy fix? Use a translating service to turn everything into Arabic or Russian and back again. If what which it makes arrive that kind of thing is read and meaning is not formed, none of that really you worry!

Where is my mysterious missing Hard Disk space?

The rest of the world considers Kilo and Mega to be multipliers of a thousand and a hundred thousand respectively. Unfortunately, the nerds who designed computers don’t seem to count in anything but binary. The obscure number of 1024 became the multiplier, and they went right ahead and called it “Kilo” anyway. So in reality, 1 megabyte = 1048576 bytes. Manufacturers caught on, thinking it would be simpler to advertise a 1 Terrabyte drive, but give a few GBs less. That explains the difference between the memory space you expect, and the memory space you get. A new standard proposes to use kibibytes instead.

The Jargon File

• Cloud: A description for data online that can be accessed from many locations and platforms. A Word document saved on Google docs, for example, can be accessed from mobile phones, desktops and cybercafes. The document is said to be in the cloud.

• Distro hopper: A Distro hopper is someone who compulsively installs different flavors of Linux.

• PictBridge: PictBridge is an interface that allows cameras to be directly connected to printers, without a computer or any other device in between

• MFD: MFD stands for multi-function device. For example, a combination of a scanner, photo copying machine and printer.

• Live CD: A Live CD is typically a Linux distribution that runs directly off a CD, without any installation.

• Ubuntu: Canonical’s attempt at making a widely publicised idiot-friendly Linux distribution on the lines of Windows.

When Will The World End?

2012 AD

No, really, 5 Billion years from now, the planet will go kaput

Some people were actually surprised when the world didn’t end back in 2000, and now a group is rallying around the year 2012, just because Mayans got bored of calculating the days of the year. The more patient cultists are pin-pointing the date at 2020. They will just have to bear the disappointment. Current science dates the Sun at 5 billion years old, and at middle-age. When the sun goes nova, 5 billion years from now, is when the planet will be swallowed up in a big ball of hot gas.

Near disasters of 2012

- Microsoft will release Windows 8
- The second largest near earth space rock (Eros) will just miss us
- The Kyoto protocol will be void
- The sun will become hyperactive
- A Dalek will break loose
