SHOP OR STOP?

Decided on what you want to get this Diwali? Make sure to read the Stop Before You Shop story in our November 2010 issue.

Bundle deals mostly include accessories that you may or may not need – USB extension cords, mice, a flash

Ensure that discounted laptops don't include downgraded hardware drive or if you're "lucky" a colour printer. However, remember that although it may sound good to get a free printer, you might end up spending a lot more because of your "free" gift. I've noticed that the cheaper printers which are bundled usually have the highest running costs, and since most printer manufacturers now make their money through the cartridges you buy, it makes sense to give away cheap printers with just about anything. You'd be better off buying a more expensive printer – they have cheaper cartridges and are cheaper to run in the long haul.

As for the other goodies, the USB cord, mouse and other accessories that may be offered are rarely worth more than a few hundred rupees, so don't base your buying decision on them. I've actually noticed that the better laptop models don't actually have any offers on them. They just let the hardware specs sell themselves.

That reminds me, I saw a lot of older processor-based laptops with offers on them. These are clearance sales, and are good if you use the laptop only occasionally, but if you're buying one as your primary PC, look for new generation hardware.

Laptop models are also somewhat complicated, and it's not uncommon for configuration to be downgraded and offered for a discount. When looking at comparisons online, don't just look at the model number and the performance scores, but also look at the hardware specs. You don't want to buy a model that won our tests, only to find out that during the festive season the configurations were changed and you actually got a lot less than you expected.

I hope I was able to help you buy smarter this Diwali. Remember, you can also write in to me if you run into a deal that you just cannot decipher. Wish you a very happy Diwali, and I hope you will shop smart, and shop safe. d
