Vodafone said that the implementation of such a system on a network with such a large consumer base was bound to have its teething problems, but there's no shortage of complaints.

Amongst those who didn't like the content blocker were one customer who found himself blocked not just from adult content but all his corporate e-mail. One user was prevented from Vodafone has started an adult-content blocker on its 3G server. It will block porn as well as gambling sites reaching the Sky mobile site because the news site "might contain stories inappropriate for people under 18". Yet another said the system simply wasn't working, because when he typed in "porn" in Google, he was able to surf porn sites within seconds.

In January this year, all major UK network operators agreed on a code of practice designed to restrict access to adult content with the aim of protecting children. They signed up to have their filters in place by the end of 2004.

A TV on your lap

Ever wished for a laptop that you could use as a TV set? Of course you have, but then there's the hassle of attaching a TV tuner card, starting up a special software, and so on, right?

Toshiba has come up with just what you might want: a laptop it calls Qosmio, which allows you to watch TV without booting the computer up. Combine this with what Toshiba says is the best laptop display in the market, and you've got a great product on your hands. Analysts say this is the beginning of a trend that will last for years to come. The Qosmio will be Toshiba's first laptop to fully integrate audio and video features, including a bright, near-TV-quality display, DVD drive, TVtuner, and enhanced speakers. A user could click on the TV with the laptop's remote control, or watch a DVD movie without having to go through the process of starting the OS.

There's a caveat, however: if you want to pause a show, or record a broadcast onto the hard disk, you'll need to boot up the system. But then, imagine watching TV and recording a clip onto your hard disk, just with a mouse click, and having access to the clip ever after.
