Opera and Konqueror support flash, but Mozilla doesn't. However, Mozilla's e-mail client is light, and has good features. It's no Outlook, but it will handle your mail in a familiar way. Also, remember that you won't be able to transfer your Outlook mails to Evolution or Mozilla. This can only be achieved using third-party tools, and involves a complicated process. These clients still perform well, use much less system resources, and imitate Outlook well.

All the OSes help you set up a LAN card during the setup process itself, while providing a GUI configuration interface. The only difference is how you access the network shares of other Linux, Apple and Windows computers.
