

GENDER

BENDERS

Vikram Rajagopal vs Jisha Punyani

Googlewhacking

5 links

Googlewhacking was the last thing Vikram had expected. Pensively, he chose his first search phrase—'icosahedron history' (of course, he had the dictionary to help him). That got him 25,900 links. The other terms he used were 'raitt factfile', 'nanovalent' and 'hexanumeric'. His performance improved with each attempt, and his last attempt of 'hexanumeric' gave him a commendable five links. Keep trying, Vikram, and you'll get there!

1 link

On hearing about the task, Jisha seemed clueless at first. After understanding the concept of Googlewhacking, she seemed reluctant to start. Four attempts were given to the duo and their task was to return only one search result. Jisha tried combinations such as 'aberdeen angus', 'jujube', 'mutex vlogging', and 'mutex hydration'. She got a high number of links every time—8,52,000 hits for 'Aberdeen Angus'. Her final attempt comprised the words 'mutex vlogging', and Google displayed just one link. Good going, Jisha!

YAHOO! IS AUDIBLE

Now Find That Podcast On Yahoo!

Web media giant Yahoo! has launched a free Web audio search service that helps users find, hear and buy everything from music downloads, interviews, Podcasts and other Web audio content.

Although Yahoo! Audio Search, at <http://audio.search.yahoo.com>, is still in testing, it gives users access to more than 50 million audio files as the Web site increases the amount of media content it offers.

Apart from the well-known record labels and music artists, the service also taps independent publishers and the Web, helping users find such things as music videos, reviews and photographs of artists.

Yahoo! and rivals such as Google and Blinkx have already launched video search services as the Internet's role in entertainment grows, and ad revenues pour in.

The company has integrated Yahoo! Audio Search with its video search service, and has invited people to submit videos and music through Media Really Simple Syndication, so it can be found by the new audio search engine. It also integrated tools from its comparison shopping search engine, which helps users find CD prices and make purchases from a variety of retailers.

In doing this, Yahoo! has forayed into all forms of Internet search and cataloguing—the fastest growing source of income for most online companies.

YES, DOWNLOAD IT!

Britons Take Initiative In Legal Movie Downloads

A UK firm has started a video download service in the hope of creating a viable commercial alternative to renting or buying DVDs. The service, called BoxOffice365.com, allows customers to download videos of VHS quality.

As of now, only a few live comedy and music video services are available, but the British Internet Broadcasting Company (BiBC), the entity behind the service, promises a significant content catalogue will be uploaded by the end of September.

Some of the content, such as The Sex Pistols' TV debut of Anarchy in the UK will be made available for purchase for the first time. The firm has signed publishing agreements with a number of publishers including V2, ITN and Laughing Stock.

However, only one film studio—Universal—has so far signed an agreement. BiBC's founder Paul Hague admitted Hollywood has been reticent about offering legal downloads

Googlewhacking

No, Googlewhacking is not beating the hell out of someone who says Google has the most number of indexed pages! It is the art and science of searching with two dictionary-recognised words such that the query yields just one result. For example, "orchestrator bamboozling", "metronome dewpoint", and so on. So it's a bit like hitting a bulls-eye with Google search.

The term is a brainchild of Gary Stock—he was so obsessed with finding such results that he created this game with rules called Googlewhacking.

Stock lays out the rules for keeping score: one point for a pure Googlewhack, meaning a single result for your query; one point if you learn something; and a bonus point if you "laugh even more" at the results.