

An Online Cache Of LNG

A journalist took up the task of writing on all things LNG (Liquefied Natural Gas). He now has a commercially successful Web site and global clientele to his credit

Preethi Chamikutty

Depleting natural resources have made imperative the need for conservation. An equally pressing need is that of finding new sources of energy. With coal, petrol, diesel, LNG and other fuels becoming dearer every day, every nation is striving to find an oil well of its own.

These topics—petro-products, LNG, and so on—are, therefore, hot. A look at a Web site called LNGjournal.com reveals that there is also politics involved; there are debates; there are international agreements. There is a need amongst professionals in the field to gather the latest news and views, to gain insights into what is going on in the world as regards LNG, alternative energy sources, and so on.

There are relatively few people out there qualified and passionate enough to make informed judgments about what's going on. Kamlesh Trivedi is one of them.

Trivedi, basically a business reporter, decided that since he had the knowledge and the insights, he could actually make a living off what he knew. Thus began LNGWorldwide.com, floated in April 2004. It is one of the few dedicated Web sites on LNG.

The Beginnings

Trivedi has been a business reporter for more than 13 years now. A graduate of St. Xavier's college (Ahmedabad), he completed his masters in Economics from M S University of Baroda. Trivedi's first stint was with The Financial Express, where he dealt with corporate news and finance. After moving to The Economic Times in mid-1995, he started covering the energy sector.

"I realised that this sector had tremendous potential. Baroda houses the main office of the Gujarat State Electricity Board, and polymer production capacity in and around Baroda is very high. These factors increased my interest in the subject," recalls Trivedi.

His involvement with LNG deepened when he joined Gulf News as an energy correspondent in early 2003. This gave him the chance to be in the midst of the action. He travelled extensively in Oman, Iran, Kuwait, Qatar and other Middle-Eastern countries.

Illustration: Ahllesh Prasad

