Adding Words To Your Businesses

Advertising doesn't always need to be in-your-face and graphic. As we found out, a quiet text box can be just as effective

Mithun Kidambi

Time and again, it has been proven that advertisements targeting a specified audience will generate most response. More so, when using the Internet as a medium for advertising. We take a look at two Web sites that employed a specific service to fulfill their advertising needs keeping this very dictum in mind.

What would a small time business do if it needed to advertise its Web service or Web presence? Go to some of the lesser known Web sites and get itself a barter ad which is rather ineffective or buy some space from the Internet heavyweights for huge sums of money which is daunting as far as the expense is concerned.

So is a small player on the Internet forever relegated to obscurity the vast cyber world provides ever so willingly? Such an event is in deviation from the real purpose of the Internet, which is to bring power to the proles. Well not in a "Workers of the world unite" way. But, yes, the Internet is supposed to bring every person—who has access and is equipped with the requisite skills or knowledge—on a common plane.

The disparity between an organisation and a business will soon disappear and an idea whose time has come will sell, notwithstanding old world economics. All of this would happen if effective Internet marketing were accessible to the normal public, like the neighbourhood bookstore who has just set up an online sales portal. Romantic notions? Not quite.

The Subjects

Take the case of www.alltimeshoppe.com, a small time online book store in Delhi. Promoted by Dr Y P Gogia, a PhD in anthropology, Alltimeshoppe.com sells books on a number of subjects and has been in existence since 1997.

"Circumstances compelled me to give up my job and start a business. I had earlier started a computer hardware business in 1992. Later, in 1997, I started Alltimeshoppe.com. Since then, I've seen the online sales business grow," says Gogia.
