Show Off Drug Dealers Snapped

A gang has been charged with drug trafficking in Brazil after they took pictures of themselves with kilos of cocaine on their mobile phones. Police in Sao Paulo, Brazil, arrested the men acting on a tip off. On searching them, the Police found marijuana and cocaine on them but not in enough quantities to charge them with drug dealing.

But the police just had to switch on the gangs' camera phone to put them behind bars. As luck would have it, the gang had clicked pictures of them packing kilos of cocaine and with a large amount of marijuana.

A police spokesperson said: "We're glad they are such show offs! They helped us by registering their criminal actions... that was great."

PayPal No Gay Pal

Paypal, the pay via the net company, is back to moral policing and this time it has got itself a non-mainstream partner. The company has shut down the relief fund of 'Cruising For Sex', a free gay cruising organisation.

The site had been set up to solicit donations from the user base for "CoS" employees who lived in New Orleans. After four days, they got the boot for "violating PayPal's Acceptable Use Policy regarding Mature Audiences".

Paypal then restored the account for a brief period only to shut it back down. It remains closed even now. No communication form the organisation could convince Paypal that an adult-oriented business could possibly do things that didn't involve sex and intended to help people.

Cruising for Sex has now sued Paypal and is seeking permanent restoration of the account and a declaratory judgment to force the point that they are doing things in line with PayPal's ToS.

They are also seeking damages for breach of contract and emotional distress. The outcome of this little battle should be interesting since this is the first lawsuit that targets Paypal for their behaviour.

Chip Deep Inside...

Computer chips that store music could soon be put into a woman's breast implants. One breast could hold an MP3 player and the other, the entire music collection. BT Futurology, which has developed the idea, says it could be available within 15 years.

An analyst at BT Laboratories said that flexible plastic electronics would sit inside the breast. A signal would be relayed to headphones, while Bluetooth, using a panel on the wrist, would control the device.

But it's not just a song and a swing. The application can be used for a number of useful purposes as well. With an implant in such a strategic spot, scientists claim that the sensors around the body linked through the electrical impulses in the chips may also be able to warn wearers about heart murmurs, blood pressure increases, diabetes and even breast cancer.

Music to your 'ears'?

Caught In The Chat

In Belgium, all you need to do to prove adultery on the part of your partner is to show a copy of dirty e-mails sent by him or her, or their chat logs. Top judges in Belgium have ruled that erotic talk with a virtual partner in chatrooms on the Web can constitute proof of "grossly insulting behaviour" and can be used as evidence in a divorce case.

A local legal paper cited the example of a ruling by the Brussels Appeals Court, which recently accepted printouts of an erotic chat as evidence in an adultery trial. Although the printouts were inadequate to prove anything, the judges found they could constitute grounds for divorce because the behaviour was found to be clearly "unworthy."

And we thought Belgium was liberal and all...

'Tis Better To Give...

A pensioner in Germany received a bumper bonanza of goods including four boats, 12 bicycles and a mobile home after an impostor posing as the senior citizen spent 400,000 (Rs 2 crore) on a series of eBay auctions in a wild night of shopping. Why Horst Lukas was targeted remains a mystery; but whether he was a victim of a shopaholic, a prankster or an incompetent fraudster is the least of his worries just now. Lukas is fielding dozens of complaints—and even threats—after refusing to pay for the fraudulently-ordered goods.
