Unwind

How we unwind

The Office

What can we say? We're huge fans. No meal time can now be complete without at least one episode of The Office (US) and in fact, why not just one more? Or two? Maybe three? In the end we just end up having the longest possible meals and it's only when we hear the buzzing of the flies that we realise how late it is.

A glimpse of the After Life

After Earth. An assault on the senses and the minds of your favourite Digit writers. The supremely horrific tale, a by-product of Shyamalan's "imagination" pushed even the hardest of us to breaking point and even moved Jayesh to prose. Have a look at his review in DGT to catch a glimpse of our suffering.

Taiwanese Times

Apart from attending Computex, Nimish and Jayesh got to spend over a week in Taipei last month. Blown away by their public transport, warm, welcoming people, authentic Chinese food -- dumplings, stinky tofu, original cuppa noodles -- and comforting foot massages, the duo seem depressed upon their return.

digit DIARY

We're a friendly bunch at Digit and we're always ready to welcome any newcomer with open arms, be it a new minion, cat or dog. But we do draw the line somewhere and rats belong on the other side of it. Some of us are terrified of rats (no names, this writer would very much like to keep his job thank you) and eliminating them was designated as the first priority.

We had previously had some rat troubles, with a rat deciding to pass away in some inconvenient little nook above our customer services department, but this last rat was different. Sid decided to spend a night in Raaabo's room to catch up on some much needed sleep, but ended up being subject to the gentle caresses of a particularly amorous rat. A hissy-fit and some sticky-traps later, he decided that Jayesh's snores were preferable to the caresses of a rat and spent the night in the TC.

The next day found the poor bugger (the rat, not Siddharth) stuck hard on the mouse trap, half-dead with exhaustion. Much as we tried to ignore it as just a rat, we couldn't bear the thought of the poor thing dying like that and decided to take matters into our own hands. Following a lengthy debate on the most humane way to kill it, we decided to blow its brains out with the gun.

Siddharth volunteered to pull the trigger, he did, after all, share a connection, however tenuous (the rat loved him dammit). Besides, everyone else was too squeamish anyway. What followed was just a sad tale of a botched execution, muttered last rites and a satisfying meal for a couple of crows. Not something to dwell upon at length. Moving on to more savory topics, we got a couple of new minions this month, Varad and Umang. They've proven themselves to be quite capable and have melded well with the team. The steady influx of new guys has one, rather unsavoury side effect though. We old hands are really beginning to feel our age (at the ripe old age of 25 and beyond).

This aspect was startlingly highlighted when we found Umang fruitlessly struggling with our landline. He was apparently trying to call McDonalds but couldn't get through. Further interrogation turned up the very surprising (to us) fact that he'd never heard a dial-tone in his life! It wasn't even just limited to him, we found that none of our interns, even our "Intern of the Year!" had ever heard a dial-tone. If there was anything to highlight the rapid advances in technology over the years, this has to be it.

Also, following fatal1ty's interview at Computex (on our SKOAR DVD) our daily Quake matches have turned into the most intense frag-fests that we've ever had in the past two years or more. Staying in the air is almost as dangerous as touching the ground as everyone is rapidly mastering the art of smiting their opponent in mid-air. The matches are frenetic and fast-paced blood-baths with players literally spawning in a shower of their own gibbs, a ridiculously awesome spectacle of brutal skill and gluttonous blood-lust.
