Robotalk

Want to own a personalized robot toy? Look no further than Robotalk, a cute little desktop gizmo that offers more than just eye candy. This table-top robot runs on Ubuntu and a 1.6 GHz Intel Atom chip with 1GB RAM, 8GB storage, and offers features like a USB slot, LAN and Wi-Fi support. It also bundles in a 2MP camera, 60-LED array and proximity sensors. Robotalk can sync with Google Calendar to remind you of appointment, read the news through RSS, and is always ready to kick you out of cubicle boredom with a witty, unsuspecting sense of humour. Obviously, it is insanely expensive.

Sonos Playbar

Part of a home theatre's appeal and success is based on its audio performance, making speakers (surround speakers at that!) an essential building block of the experience. But the Sonos Playbar isn't just a dull and boring speaker set, it's a smart one at that. One of the most touted feature of the this slick soundbar is its ability to wirelessly stream and play music from the cloud. Inside the case are six mid woofers and three tweeters, and the Playbar claims to play both clear low-level frequencies and distortion-free deep sounding bass at high volumes. And it's ridiculously easy to use.

Suunto Ambit2

This one's for all you fitness and adventure freaks. Imagine getting rid of your smartphone (just for once) and velcro-straps, but still have the ability to track your fitness (other things) while on a jog or an exploration trek? A Swiss army knife of watches, the Suunto Ambit2 not only has GPS tracking to keep an eye on your running speed, distance and vertical, it also offers a full range of navigation functions (chronograph, barometer, compass, etc.). Apart from all this the wristwatch can also keep tabs on your vitals, while you're in the middle of swimming stroke or pedalling through a desert. The watch supports its very own app store with over 5,000 distinct apps. Go grab it now!
