Unwind

How we unwind

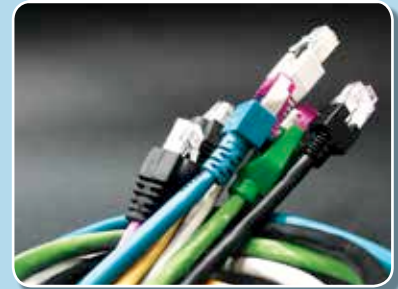

SuperHexagon

It all started the day Regidi brought his iPad to office and we heard some horribly addictive soundtrack in the background. It turned out, he was playing SuperHexagon. And then Siddharth was playing, then Jayesh, then Ant, pretty soon everyone was playing and literally fighting over each other to set a record.

Pacific Rim

The team was a little apprehensive of this movie initially, but we left our brains at home and decided to have fun and we did! The movie rocked, monstrous robots beating monstrous monsters to a pulp with their bare metal fists. What's not to like? This movie really is a must-watch.

Real broadband

There is something seriously therapeutic in watching a download progress bar that's indicating speeds in MBps. We finally got an 8Mbps line in our office to complement our three, woefully inadequate 4Mbps lines. We now spend many an hour just watching the progress bar on our downloads.

digit DIARY

A calamitous month at Digit. First, Jayesh caught some bug and ended up spending a fortnight in the bathroom, then the Ant fell ill and lost his voice. That coupled with the stricter deadlines that we were instructed to adhere to (you want your magazine on time don't you?) resulted in the most catastrophically bad start to a month that we've ever had.

The second calamity was the arrival of the Mahindra e2o. What's so bad about that you ask? Well, it was rear-ended within a couple of hours of taking it out for a spin, by a Skoda Laura no less. Regidi was at the wheel and Sid was riding shotgun at the time of the accident, but rather than inspecting the damage, Sid was more fascinated by the changing shade of Regidi's face. It went from a healthy pink to a beetroot red in a matter of seconds. Luckily, the damage wasn't serious (the e2o is a hardy car) and we managed to get on our way without much hassle.

The third calamity was Siddharth's much awaited MX6021 speakers. We had, with great difficulty, found a distributor who still had some Altec Lansing MX6021 speakers in stock and placed an order for two of them. It was many weeks later that we finally got our hands on them and to say that we were excited would be an understatement. Sadly, our excitement was short-lived when we discovered that the right-speaker terminal was damaged. We're planning to rip it apart and figure out what went wrong though, so all might not be lost.

The fourth calamity was quite simply, the Ant's bad luck. He seems to have had the luck of the Starks about him this month. Beginning with his illness at the start, he was first saddled with the DVDs, which took forever to make owing to some technical troubles. This was followed by his CPU cooler test which got dragged for more than a week owing to the difficulty in installing some of the more complex coolers (we're pretty sure that he would have strangled any rep from the participating companies on sight). If that wasn't enough, he broke his mouse, lost his Corsair K70 to Siddharth and hasn't won a single Quake III match all month. To top off his already overflowing plate was the rat that we sentenced to be summarily executed. The poor kid wanted to rehabilitate it at some far off location but we ended up shooting it anyway.

The fifth, and worst calamity has to be Nimish's betrayal. There's no easy way to put it, he's left us in search of greener pastures. May he die in ignominy in some far off corner of the Earth for abandoning us to our fate! We will miss him though, his sudden bursts of cacophonous laughter, his expressive eyebrows and the frequent expletives that Siddharth hurls in his direction. Siddharth was worst hit, not just because he lost his dearest drinking buddy, but more importantly because he has no one to torment. In fact, the rat execution this month was a decidedly horrific one and we feel that Sid was just venting his anger on the hapless rodent (Shhh! Don't tell him we told you!).
