

Most web sites that aggregate deals follow a similar format, the only difference is that certain offers are specific to a particular website so you won't find them on other aggregator websites. This is partly due to affiliate programs and partly due to the actual work undertaken by the site administrators. <http://www.FreeKaaMaal.com> has been around for about three years now and is pretty much one of the most prominent deal aggregator in India. The site also has a section for coupons but rarely do e-commerce sites allow for coupling of two or more offers so if you do end up getting in on a good deal then it is likely that a coupon can't be clubbed with it.

Moreover, they also host a forum which covers quite a diverse spectrum of deal hunting. Members vote on certain deals and the feedback decides whether it attains a "featured deal" status or not. You can even find freebie deals which could entail free home delivery of sample packs. We've heard of folks making multiple accounts to get a month's worth of toiletries. You even get the scoop on international freebie deals, then you can get a bunch of people interested in the same product to get a discounted shipping deal. This is quite similar to a GO(Group Order).

If you doubt the veracity of any of the featured deals then there is even a review section to help clear your qualms. One last thing you can get done is have

Alternatives (Indian)

Given the huge spurt in the number of deal sites in India we now have plenty of alternatives to look at.

<http://www.desidime.com>
<http://www.dealofthedayindia.com>
<http://www.snapdeal.com>
<http://www.dealsandyou.com>

others help you find a deal on whatever product you wish to buy. While not every query goes answered you can easily expect a few responses. Khojguru.com is another site which hasn't been a victim to an aggressive takeover that others which started around the same time have been.

The banality of landing plenty of deals is something that metropolitan cities enjoy and the rest of India doesn't. For those staying in rural areas, even if you were to find a great deal online there is the possibility that they might not deliver to your location.

Buying from abroad

A very common occurrence is when one of your friends or relatives are coming from the United States is that you'd ask them to get a little something for you. Given the free-trade agreements that it has with almost every major manufac-

Alternatives (Abroad)

There is no one site which covers every product category so here are a few websites that you may check out in case you can't find what you wanted.

<http://www.dealsofamerica.com>
<http://www.deals2buy.com>
<http://www.dealnews.com>
<http://www.fatwallet.com>

turing nation it enjoys the best prices you can find. And to make the deal sweeter we've shortlisted a few websites for you.

The most common destinations for buying cheap electronics incidentally has a high volume of Indian tourism. They are Singapore, UK, UAE and the United States. If you've got Singapore in your crosshair then check out <http://www.deal.com.sg> and <http://www.mustafa.com.sg/MMSProduct/>. Both of these are the best places to look for online deals in Singapore, but the actual action takes place at Sim Lim square and Funan Mall. Unfortunately, Funan Mall doesn't have any pricelists which you could refer but stores on Sim Lim square do. We found one particular store which kept an updated list of prices for computer components in particular – BizGram. You can check out the latest prices here <http://dgjit.in/15nejPK>.

For the UK there is <http://www.hotukdeals.com/> which should be more than enough for your shopping needs.

The United States has pretty much the best prices of them all, and <http://www.slickdeals.com> should cover pretty much all of them. Getting $250-300 off on a medium to high configuration laptop is one of the most common deals you can get. International warranty is somewhat a concern here since the policies change from nation to nation, so if you were eligible for a 3 year warranty in the US that might not be the case by the time you get your product shipped to India. However, given the massive discounts one can hardly complain.

The UAE is also a great place to get electronics for cheap but there are hardly any online sites which one can refer to

Video game deals

There are numerous online game distribution platforms but Steam still reigns supreme. However, the competition is doing its part to change this dynamic. While nothing on the horizon will be able to even remotely dent the market share that Steam enjoys in the foreseeable future, it hasn't stopped folks from trying. Let's look at the major players here, they have great deals on their own which is why keeping an eye out on these websites/platforms is something that you shouldn't skip out on. Though these are mainly platforms they regularly feature great deals which are not all captured by the aggregator sites.

Steam

The Mac daddy of them all, steam has this innate ability to empty bank balances over a period of one week, spread three to four times over the year. Gamers have been known to go on a diet and skip a few meals in order to squeeze in a few extra games into their game libraries. Steam is cross platform too, so it works on Windows, Linux and Mac.

Origin

The success of Origin is purely due to EA's mighty arsenal of successful games. The fan following is so huge that it took next to no effort to have people jump