Power Banks Feature

quite well. Half of the body is covered with a rubber hard coat which not only makes it durable but also provides a little traction. This way you can be sure your powerbank won't accidentally go sliding across the table when you give it a tap. This doesn't mean that we loathe the shiny ones, you can have rubber casing with a glossy texture as well. The only exception was the AsiaPower AP2200B which used brushed aluminium for its outer casing. A nice design, but, edges chamfered would have made it much better.

One powerbank which was like an attachment for the iPhone 5 was the Luxa 2. Slipping your iPhone 5 in it will effectively double the thickness. Surprisingly, it doesn't come with a lightning cable of its own. There are two sides to this "feature". One, having a small attachment would mean that you can pop your phone in the powerbank and continue using it without any loss in productivity. Two, a device being charged does heat up a bit which makes it a little less comfortable to use. Don't worry about all those emails regarding excessive radiation emitted by a phone while it is being charged, there are limits to how much radiation a phone can emit. In order to ensure that a particular model can be sold in most countries around the world manufacturers ensure that each model conforms to the most stringent standards that any country might have.

Another thing we saw was that some in power banks were compact and could be attached directly without any cable. They aren't bulky to the point that normal operation of a device could be hindered and they didn't sit flush to the phone/tablet surface. This was good because in this case it doesn't block the microphone completely. We got two such models and both of them were made by Portronics(PICO II and Emergency Power).
