

GeekLife

We take a look at the most overhyped and overrated products and announcements of the year.

Mood changing device

An upcoming device promises to change your mood by zapping your head using a smartphone. <http://dgit.in/AppMood>

iKettle

This trendy looking smart kettle promises to make a mark in your daily habits from the time you wake up till you get your daily dose of caffeine. This is the world's first Wi-Fi enabled electric kettle that can be controlled through an iOS and Android app from anywhere in the world, no less from the comfort of your bed. It can wake you up with an alarm and perfectly heated water at a desired temperature, or you can just instruct the kettle to maintain water at a particular temperature for as long as you want. All set for the smart life, you? Make it happen!

Drool on towards your smart home dream

Sen.se Mother

There are only two possible reactions to this device – extreme happiness or extreme terror. Happiness because it sits in your home, sensing everything and sundry, in a connected smart home environment. Terror because we live in a post-Snowden world. Be that as it may, equipped with an army of sensors (Sense Cookies) which can be placed around your home, which you control through Sense Mother (hah!), this thing can track and record everything from whether you've brushed today to how many cups of coffee you've brewed, from whether you've taken your medication to sense how many people are in the house at any given point of time. Wanna try? Be our guest.

