

Coffee on the ISS

Remember ISSpresso, the first coffee machine that works on zero-gravity? It has finally reached the ISS

Chernobyl drone tour

A filmmaker paid visit to a 30-year old Chernobyl disaster site with his GoPro and drone. <http://dgit.in/ChernoDrone>

8 Over-hyped tech products and services of 2014

Sometimes you're better off keeping your money where your wallet is...

Vishweshwar Jatain readersletters@digit.in

1 Apple iPhone 6

This year, a Polish man called Dariusz Wlodarski became famous for "being the guy who stood in a queue for 44 hours to buy an iPhone, in the hopes of winning back his estranged wife". But long queues don't hide the fact that there is nothing ground breaking about the iPhone 6 – sure, it's bigger and faster, but what about innovation? Just a few weeks after the release, pictures of bent iPhones were circulating all over social media with the solemn advice of not keeping the device in your pocket, as the chassis was prone to bending.

Beckham would be proud.

The scandal even got its own name and hashtag: #bendgate. Apple's nightmare became its competitors' joy when brands like Samsung, LG, Asus, and HTC started promoting their products in the guise of satire. More recently, an Arizona man suffered first and second degree burns after his iPhone caught fire inside his pocket following a minor rickshaw accident. Ouch! Some users have also complained that the seam between the aluminium and glass was pulling out their facial hair. So yes, if you like disappointment and pain, you can't go wrong with the iPhone 6.

2 BlackBerry Passport

The first thing you'll want to do when you buy the Passport is have your tailor increase the width of pockets in your pants and jackets. It's almost as if BlackBerry put together a focus group and the only feedback they received was: "Just make it really wide, okay?" BlackBerry once catered to a market segment largely overlooked by everyone else – the professionals who just wanted to get work done without any distractions. These people typically scorn the touchscreen keyboard, think that watching videos on a phone is a waste of time, and aren't interested in playing Angry Birds. After many years of dwindling market share and dishing out confused products, the Passport is a desperate attempt from BlackBerry to win back their original user base, who have since moved on to the greener pastures of iOS and Android. To be fair, not everything is wrong with Passport, it sports a long battery life, sharp display, a decent camera and a robust build, but that fails to make up for the awkward keyboard, clumsy software and the fact that it's practically unusable with one hand. And it's the squarest phone ever; really, it's freakishly square.

Human hand for scale.

3 Smart watches

Ever since Apple announced that it's working on a smart watch, everyone from LG to Samsung to Motorola has jumped the bandwagon in