both functionality and aesthetics. At its core, the app is a beautifully designed tracking app packed with a host of underlying features. Save a list of all your favorite TV shows, and the app will notify you if and whenever new episodes are available. It also lets you mark episodes as watched so if you decide to pick up that old sitcom after a few months, you won't have to sift through multiple episodes to figure out where you left off. Each episode summary is crisp and well-written, without spoiling the central plot.

The app helps you discover new and trending TV shows, while also showing you recommendations from friends who are using the app. In addition, all your data is automatically backed up on iCloud, so you never have to forget which episode of FRIENDS you were on during your latest umpteenth run.

Tiii.me

Tiii.me is an answer one important question that every TV lover asks: How many days should I take off from work to binge watch this show I have on my watch list? Just type in the name of the TV show, and the website will let you know just how many hours, days, and weeks it will take to watch it from start to the last released episode. If you're feeling particularly languid, the website also allows you to enter multiple TV shows, providing an exact total estimate of time required. What it doesn't provide is a good excuse to skip work for your next gargantuan TV marathon.

Gaming Content

How to get hooked YouTube Reviewers

Gaming-centric websites like IGN, GameSpot, Machinima, and Kotaku have always been the average gamer's mainstay for news and reviews of video games. However, the tide has been turning a lot of late, and gamers everywhere have begun to hunt for other, more "unbiased" sources for video games reviews. Thus exploded the culture of YouTube video game commentators who cater to each and every game genre.

While there are channels dedicated to video reviews such as GameTrailers and GamesRadar, as well as the obvious big names such as IGN and the like, YouTubers such as Total Biscuit (aka Cynical-Brit) and Angry Joe have carved a name for themselves in the gaming video-sphere. Total Biscuit's (www.youtube.com/user/TotalHalibut) extensive first-impressions videos of PC games—both mainstream and indie titles—and are laced with quality content. His in-depth analysis and PC-centric focus on games have made him one of the premier video game review personalities for PC gamers. Similarly, Angry Joe (www.youtube.com/user/AngryJoeShow), with his no-holds-barred video reviews, explores AAA titles from all popular platforms. His videos have high production value and focus on the fun factor of games while ripping apart their obvious shortcomings.

Other YouTubers you should check out for awesome gaming-related content are ProJared, for his crazy one-minute reviews, and SuperBunnyHop, for his articulate and extremely well-written video reviews, many of which come sprinkled with insightful comments on the current state of the video gaming scene.

How to stay hooked HowLongToBeat

Many a gamer have hesitated to pick up a new and exciting looking title simply because they thought it would take too long to finish. HowLongToBeat (<http://www.howlongtobeat.com>) helps you circumvent this problem by helping you estimate the time required to complete a video game. In this context, completion could mean anything between a speedrun to complete the single player story to an extensive completionist run, requiring you to 100% all available objectives including side quests and (often annoying) achievements. The site makes use of data gathered from thousands of gamers worldwide, ensuring these estimates are as accurate as possible.

Create a list of all the games you've played. Add the one's you've yet to finish in your backlog. Mark some favourites for a replay so you remember to return to them when you run out of good games to play. Just kidding! You'll never run out of

Games Finder

Ever finish a riveting game and find yourself addicted? Maybe you want to sample some more of that awesome gameplay/genre/setting (whatever made that particular game special) but with a twist? Games Finder (<http://gameslikefinder.com/>) is the answer to your gaming recommendation needs. Let's say you want to find games similar to Diablo 3. Simply type in the name and the site will churn out a list of related games. It does this by referring to a curated list of games, which is assessed by analysing the likes and dislikes of gamers who use the website.

"We should really do this 'playing outside' thing more often."

Games Finder also maintains in-depth reviews of popular games with support for user ratings, so you can make a well-informed decision when it comes to picking up a new game. The site lists games from almost all popular platforms, so you are not restricted to PC-only recommendations if you want to find games similar to PC exclusives such as StarCraft 2.
