2022 in Tech

All show, no go. For the most part.

his year was a ride. A long and painful one. Everytime some piece of technology was put on the mainstage of the internet, everyone went berserk. And, for no reason at all. The products that companies released this year were painful to look at. There was the iPhone 14 Pro Max – “the greatest phone ever”. I don’t know for what reason. I don’t want to know. Let them be happy in the little cute bubbles they have formed where they think they are the greatest of all.

We had other launches as well like the Pixel 6a, and a ton of phones, speakers, headphones... My point is why tout the feathers that you don’t have in your hat? It was not only the products that were launched which pushed me to be on the brink of pulling whatever hair I have left on my head. So, after a point I just trained my social algorithms to put the crazy news from the world of tech into the spam box.

However, this month I just happened to stray into that folder and I had just one question. WHAT WERE THEY THINKING? Elon played merry go round with Twitter before finally buying the company. And then he proceeded to allegedly lay off scores of people from Twitter divisions across the globe.

Then there was this whole NFT and cryptocurrency hype that came and went. I know that crypto currency was a thing before 2022, but the way the hype died down, at least in the few circles I am a part of, was somewhat satisfying to watch from a distance.

The lesser number of miners out there in the world, the higher the number of GPUs available for the people who could actually use it for work and most importantly, gaming. Call me a sadist, when I talk about the plight of the ruthless miners, but my thoughts stand as they did.

Watching all this, Meta thought, how can we miss out on being in the limelight? So, they went and served data of more than half a billion users to hackers on a silver plate. It wasn’t only one of their services that were as it would turn out Valve and Rockstar are also in the race of – who loses their data first?

Rockstar were ripped off their gameplay footage of GTA VI, which I don’t think I will get to play in this lifetime. And, Valve’s unwanted kid at this point, CS:GO had millions of dollars worth of skins stolen from user’s accounts. To make up for this, they re-designed the Steam app on the PC and phones. As expected, they screwed up that as well. I want to know what goes into the minds of the developers and the design team at Valve. They had ONE job. Make the login page of the Steam PC app, and the mobile version of the app to look better and modern. And, they screwed it up.

Where does it end? cries I keep on talking about bursting a nerve in my brain in my articles.

These companies seem to have caught on to it, and are out to get me. However, I am one of those who are impossible to target. So, when they are ready with their arsenal, in 2023, I will be standing tall to face them. Bring on the iPhone 15, the Pixel 7a, and the rest. Boo-Man is here. I have my plans. Things are about to get spicier. All you need to do is read my article every month and carry the flag forward. For the fanboys who are in my mailbox and social media DMs, coming at me with all the verbose blabber they have, I am ready to come back stronger at you so beware.

If you want facts, I will bring them for you, and if you come at me with the Reddit jokes; I practically invented them, so don’t bother with those. Cling on to your devices and try your best.

If you thought that this was a face reveal, then you couldn’t be further from the truth. Or is it my face?

affected by data leaks. Two of their biggest platforms, WhatsApp and Facebook (who uses it anymore?) were targeted by hackers, who practically slid their hot knives across the “secure” servers of Meta, and cut out chunks of the buttery slabs that their servers are.

Even the world of gaming was not safe. That was the last place I believed I would have to talk about. However,
