

ZTYPE

After a long time we saw a new game getting the folks at the Digit Test Centre addicted. Rivalries and fierce competition were revived in the corridors of the Test Centre when one day Mithun and Prakrit walked in all smiles, flaunting their scores on ZTYPE. Here's what happened...

Well, as it happens every few months, a member of the team here at Digit digs out an app or a game that we get hooked to and spend hours at the end, playing it, trying to beat each others' high scores or records. However, between shifting offices and handling the Zero1 Awards, everyone got busy and did not find time to get their hands on something "really" interesting. There was a lull period. Until one fine day, just after everyone had returned to the office after Zero1, Prakrit and Mithun found this ZTYPE

by Phoboslab. It is essentially a browser-based typing game that tracks your accuracy, rate of typing, and streaks, all while sending waves of words towards you. Once the link was posted on the team channels, everyone got to work. Not literally. The sound of furious typing echoed in the chambers of the Mumbai office. But it was not of the team members writing articles or reviews. It was of them playing games. Some claim that Robert's typing sounds could be heard all the way from the land down under. Well, the claims might as well be true because he was the one who beat everyone to claim the top spot, followed closely by Manish. There was another faint sound of screen tapping, and that was coming from Dhriti's desk as she tried to game the system and take the typing test on her phone. Alas, all these years of texting did not pay her well, as she failed to grab the top spot. The rest of the team fought well. —Satvik Pandey
