

■ SpaceX

Elon Musk

If you are someone who has been keeping an eye on the tech news space in the last year and a half, then you would have come across the name of one Mr Elon Musk. There was a time last year when every publication was failing to keep up with the updates and news about Mr Musk. But, after the dust has settled and Twitter has been acquired by Elon, there's something apart from the micro-blogging platform that he is in the news for.

Musk-founded private space, communications, and defence company SpaceX on February 12 launched 55 Starlink satellites into orbit. This is big news for the people looking forward to the launch of Starlink, as the increased number of satellites in orbit would ensure much more expansive coverage of the service, which Musk eventually wants to be available all over the world.

Following the launch of the Falcon 9 rocket, which was carrying the satellites, Musk was quick to update his followers on Twitter about the development. After posting a few updates about the launch, he was quick to move back to his original programming of posting memes and starting abstract conversations with his followers and other Twitteratis.

■ Valve

Gabe Newell

Amidst the demands of a new operation, map reworks, and better support for the game, the CS:GO community was served a controversy. It is not bad as it sounds, but what transpired in the world of Counter-Strike: Global Offensive after the launch of the Revolution Weapon Skins Case has brought back some unpleasant memories for the fans of the game.

And, as has been tradition amongst fans of any game that is developed by Valve, as soon as the news broke about the skins, the first one to be dragged into all the conversations was Gabe Newell, a.k.a, 'Lord Gaben' as fans affectionately call him.

Just to give you some context of what exactly happened, after the release of the Revolution Weapons Skins Case, members of the CS:GO community on Twitter, and artists, who have had their skins accepted into the game, came out and revealed evidence of skin designs having been copied from existing artwork without permission from the original creators.

Twitter user with the handle, @TheDanidem was the first one to break the news. He Tweeted - "The artist behind the M4A4 | Temukau, @f0rnez, is most likely cheating his way into the @CSGO Steam Workshop." He also included whatever evidence he could gather to support his claims. It was not long before that this news caught the eye of the fans, who started mentioning Lord Gabe in every other Tweet but without much success. While CS:GO Twitter flooded with Tweets, new revelations about previous submissions, and other skins in the same case being copied also surfaced.

There was a long thread of Tweets with claims and supporting evidence posted

There have been instances in the past where skins creators who had unethically copied artwork have been caught, with their submissions either being changed in the game or given a special status in the skins tier list after some rectification. However, at the time of writing, there was no response from Gabe Newell or Valve. So, it will be interesting to see what approach the company takes to deal with this issue. It will also be interesting to see the kind of impact this will have on the relationship between new and aspiring skin creators hoping to get their skins and other workshop submissions included in games, and Valve. [d]