

DIZO WATCH D PRO: IT'S GOT THE LOOKS

I used the Dizo Watch D Pro for 2 weeks and here is my experience

G.S. Vasan | vasan@digit.in Dizo recently launched the Dizo Watch D Pro and the Dizo Watch D Ultra in India. We have got the former with us and have been putting it to the test for the last few days. Dizo has offered a decent set of features for the ₹2,699 price tag which include a nice build and finish, Bluetooth calling support, 150+ watch faces, 110+ sports modes, up to 7 days of battery life claim, and a single chipset powering all these. The brand is proud of packing a solo chip for driving the BT calling and other functions efficiently. Let's see if the Dizo chipset really makes a difference and all in all, is it worth your money?

Unboxing the Dizo Watch D Pro, you get the watch and its magnetic charging cable, besides the usual papers. Right from the first time I wore it, I was happy about its fit and finish. The 22mm silicone strap is soft, designed well, and doesn't cause any discomfort while staying strapped to the wrist for a long day. Since the strap is detachable, you can easily swap it with a third-party option. There is just one Dizo branding, which is also present quietly on the keeper. The main body thus appears as a black mesa. There is a subtle curve on the edges of the 2.5D tempered glass. When light falls on it, from a certain angle, it looks like an octagon. The only cheap-feeling part of the watch is the plasticky base. The good thing is that there is no major protrusion on the bottom of the watch. Speaking of protrusion, there is a rotating crown on the right side

