

Deus Ex Machina

It's phenomenal how short a 28-day month seems. And how much more work can get packed into four weeks, as opposed to four weeks and 2-3 days. As we prepare to mark February off as done and dusted, the team's come away with a very productive month.

Gothic Adventures

In addition to all the usual events, launches and unplanned philosophical discussions, the Editorial team in the Mumbai office also managed to chalk out some time for Dungeons & Dragons. Our current game master, Sean – who has, over the last few months, been awarded the position of honorary Team Digit member – lugged a giant coffin into Digit Studios, and in a thick, Transylvanian accent, announced that he will be running at least the opening adventure of The Curse of Strahd campaign.

For the non-TTRPGers out there, TCoS is a Gothic adventure set in the valley of Barovia, one of the oldest and most well-known Domains of Dread in Ravenloft, which, in turn, is one of the Forgotten Realms.

And thus, in the guise of an explanation, we give you readers a bunch of other things to Google. You're very welcome!

Rogu E

Early this month, a bunch of us walked into the office to find some of our studio equipment missing. We were greeted by a sticky note that read "Gone to Formula E. Borrowed equipment, just in case. ~Sativk, Ali. xoxo"

It seemed like our resident racing aficionados had gone rogue. The pair

THE SHOWRUNNER

Cover stories for magazines often devolve into a "too many cooks" situation. To prevent that from happening, the cover story each month may be written by an array of writers, but it's usually spearheaded by one person in the Editorial team. This person, 'the showrunner' – also popularly known as 'the hot potato' – takes the required executive (and some creative) decisions on the direction the story's taking.

The showrunner is also the person who gets pulled up by the Inter-galactic Council of Responsible Journalists if the content of that month's cover story has far-reaching negative socio-cultural consequences. Case in point, back in 2010, when we did that cover story about the Inter-galactic Council of Responsible Journalists. We never really saw Ricky again. Who's Ricky, you ask? Exactly.

emerged from the Burnout three days later wearing Aviators and walking in slow motion, wearing smug grins. Ah, but we digress. There's some backstory required here. Rewind to about three-to-four months ago, when our two reporters were playtesting F122 for a SKOAR! review. Just to wind the racing nerds up, a few of us raised the question of whether racing games were worth being categorised under eSports, since they weren't really games. This led to a one-sided heated debate of whether tech in race cars is worth reporting on. The conversation left our minds within a day or two. But the two fanboys stoked the spark into a flame.

Fast-forward to February. Ali and Satvik ran a covert ops mission to report on technology used in Formula E cars, just to rub our noses in it. Productive vengeance, as it were.

Congressional approval

Speaking of live reporting, Dhriti spent a week of the month in Spain – with seven people from the video team backing her play from over 6,700km away (as the phoenix flies). Her purpose
