Most misunderstood thing about women?

Kavitha Prasad, Intel

The discussion of “balance”

often comes up at work and many can assume that being successful means women need to choose between family and work. It's important to remember that a professional woman taking time to care for her family does not mean work is not being prioritized. Also, being quieter and more introverted doesn't make women any less ambitious.

There are many misconceptions when it comes to women in tech, though things are changing for the better with companies hiring women. However, they shouldn't be hired just to meet the diversity criteria of an organization. Women should be given equal opportunities to excel and their brilliance, innovation, and practically should be put to good use. It's very important to have women in leadership roles to inspire young women in tech jobs.

Even with changing times, I still see that a woman has to prove her worth and may not be immediately accepted for a higher position until she proves herself. If she is outspoken, she may be considered rude or if she is mild, her voice may be buried. However, I see an opportunity here: gender bias at times has the potential to drive women more while challenging the stereotype.

Women are strong influencers of consumer purchase decisions; turn these stereotypes to strengths – women know what would sell. There's no doubt that innovation thrives on diverse ideas and success needs a 'never say die' attitude. Companies with more diversity have shown higher revenues – the numbers speak for themselves. The changes and development should be both from the industry and ecosystem on one side and from women ourselves on the other.

The post-pandemic digital workforce has the flexibility to work from anywhere. Especially, Gen Z is absolutely okay to work in any space from anywhere and therefore it gives them far greater avenues. Ironically, the amount of work women can do at home is underestimated, under the assumption that women get more time to look after their families.
