Biggest challenges for women in tech?

Kavitha Prasad, Intel

You must always maintain a growth mindset.

Every organisation has its strengths and weaknesses, and it's important as a leader to be humble enough to recognise when some things need to change. Preserving stability and reinforcing excellence in an organisation happens when you reward and empower your team. It's equally important to know when it's time to address gaps by bringing in new talent or processes. Striking the right balance here is a vital leadership skill set that enables successful organisations.

Kaveri Jain, Micron

One sore spot I observe in industry is lack of relatable figures and role models in diverse and underrepresented groups. Micron's senior leadership has established employee resource groups to build strong internal communities. Additionally, women leaders take a very active role in being available and mentoring the crop of new members that are just starting on their professional journey. This is also reflected in Micron having won "Great Place to Work" awards across geographies.

Srikripa Srinivasan, Dell

Throughout my career, I've seen women often drop out from work for multiple reasons. Sometimes, work hours are difficult, they get married, have children, and don't know how to deal with all the changes. At Dell Technologies, we ensure our women are thriving in their careers at all stages of life, whether they're re-entering the workforce after a prolonged career break or offering facilities for working mothers. When companies invest in every employee's growth, great things are bound to happen.

Snehal Meshram, Amazon

Equitable representation in the tech workforce is one of the biggest challenges women and underrepresented minorities face. Senior leadership needs to acknowledge and recognise that in order to create a fair and balanced workforce, we have to re-examine if opportunities to hire, grow and develop are being provided equitably to all employees. Women and underrepresented minorities particularly are vulnerable to their male and majority community counterparts, as the opportunities afforded to them might be different from the beginning.

Geetha Adinarayan, IBM

Some of the top challenges that people face are not being intentional about their growth, being afraid of failure and trying to change themselves to be a perfect match for a job. We as leaders need to be supportive of individual needs and be transparent about our team's growth, solving their work-life challenges and ensure they have adequate resources and tools for continuous learning.
