Impact of inclusive workforce?

Geetha Adinarayan, IBM

As a personal example, I had the opportunity to build a new team in 2022. Sticking to IBM values of being equal and through conscious thinking, I was able to put together a team model where diversity came by design. A particular instance where this was very useful was a project where we had to think about creating the best customer experience for various personas like women bankers. The diversity in the team enabled us to understand those personas better.

Snehal Meshram, Amazon

I've built a strong female representation on my team: 35% of the team is gender diverse with 38% diversity in tech roles and 70% female representation in leadership roles. We also have regional and linguistic diversity in the team, across the team we speak 10 different Indic languages at a native level. This diversity in perspective also helps us in building diverse experiences for our customers.

Jaya Jagadish, AMD

At AMD, we believe "belonging" is what every employee desires in a workplace. We have institutionalized mechanisms to reduce unconscious bias at the workplace. We run an initiative to educate our global workforce to the power of multiple voices in the recruitment and promotions process. We are driving efforts to recruit diverse talent and sensitize everyone towards an inclusive culture, where the best ideas "win" regardless of the individual's gender.

Irina Ghose, Microsoft

We have been on a journey of inclusive design, which celebrates and draws inspiration from people who are often overlooked in the typical design process. For instance, the Xbox Adaptive Controller was created to address the accessibility challenges and remove barriers to gaming by being inclusive to the needs of more gamers. It was developed in partnership with several organizations around the world, and with gamers who have limited mobility.

Sumati Sahgal, Lenovo

For me, inclusivity doesn't mean just gender inclusivity. Instead, it is about welcoming people from different backgrounds and presenting them with opportunities that help them grow. Even as a manager, I ensure that deserving people evolve alongside me and explore more opportunities that expand their avenues. In terms of outcomes, as a leader, I am glad to have the maximum number of people who moved from my team to other roles within the organization.
