

Varsha Tagare, Qualcomm

It's a great time to expand your horizons. I rotated through engineering, marketing, business development to build a strong operational view. Take advantage to build a broader view of your industry.

Srividya Rajagopalan, PayPal

Firstly, always remember that we are our own best advocates. If we do not speak for ourselves, we do not provide enough material for others to speak for us. Secondly, be aware of your own biases and stereotypes, so you at least acknowledge an external stereotype or bias for what it really is. Thirdly, it is okay to ask for help and know that if you reach out, you will be heard.

Jaya Jagadish, AMD

My advice to women is that they should embrace femininity as their core strength. When the going gets tough, lead the way by standing firm on what is right, questioning the status quo and do not shy away from making bold decisions. It is important to recognize that challenges are the biggest opportunities that will help you learn and grow. Never let go of an opportunity for the fear of failure!

Jaya Singh, Texas Instruments

To become good leaders, women need to hone their ability to take calculated risks. Believe in yourself, no matter what. Believe that you can innovate and hold the power to make a difference. At the workplace, I would encourage women to speak out their mind. They should not hesitate to ask for what they want. They should use the constructive feedback shared by seniors and colleagues to continuously improve their skills on the work front.

Snehal Meshram, Amazon

My tips to women leaders in India is to dream big, chase your passion, celebrate your wins, and own your careers. We might come across a lot of naysayers, but don't lose sight of your goals and your milestones along the way. Building multiple networking circles has helped me in times of doubt, distress and ambiguity. Reach out and ask for guidance when in doubt, don't give in to imposter syndromes!

Sumati Sahgal, Lenovo

Upskilling and preparing yourself for the future of tech are the most meaningful practices you can start with. Set a goal, reach out to others for a helping hand, and don't hesitate to look out for better opportunities. We cannot expect the world to do us favours. So we need to be prepared for the opportunity, which means having the right skill sets and investing in ourselves.