

(Un)Changing Video Games Industry

Keerti Singh

The industry has changed in terms of cutting edge tech, art and immersion. However, the core concepts of making a game that is fun and social are still important. E-sports has lent a very interesting opportunity to gamers, allowing them to demonstrate their mental acumen to win E-sports championships. The entire mobile gaming ecosystem is now capable of creating job opportunities and to contribute significantly to a country's economy.

Early on in the gaming industry it was thought that women would be in support roles like marketing rather than core game development. That's rapidly changing. However at the same time, female character representation in gaming isn't what it should be, as portrayals of women as helpless or even accessories are still widespread.

As a child, I thought video games were all glitz and glamour. What I didn't see then but realized later was the hard work, creativity, intelligence, and courage to make incredible games. The industry has continuously been changing and evolving. When I entered the industry, especially in India, it was probably not even considered a long-term industry. I'd have friends and relatives frown when they heard that I am part of a company that makes games. Now people understand the industry a bit better.

There are so many women who work tirelessly and with such passion in the games industry. My interaction with each of them has been inspirational. I have worked with an all women team in my previous job, and I continue working with some very dedicated women in my current role. There is something to learn from each of them.

I see a big change already in the ecosystem. The gaming industry is going through a monumental evolution in India and is getting recognition at a national stage as a sport. With this increased magnitude of acceptance, women can be taking up skilled positions in gaming companies, could even advocate the ed-tech sector for gaming, maybe even go ahead and win an e-World Cup.
