

Women's Gaming Career Boost?

Shruti Verma

I try to lead by example, by providing a platform to engage and create a community where we enable women to share and collaborate. We have always empowered women in the industry equally. With the Women Creators Program, girls and women in tech are providing adequate resources, training, and mentoring to women creators. Even at Nasscom, I was fortunate to be part of initiatives like starting shared services for childcare for member companies, technical training for women in IT and mentorship programs.

I demand and expect an inclusive environment in the workplace. This is achieved by ensuring everyone's voice is heard and fostering a culture of respect and acceptance. Since I've walked this path, I take great pride in being able to mentor and inspire others by sharing my experiences, providing advice and offering perspective to challenges faced by others.

Firstly, we are always looking for women members to fill our vacancies, we believe that this adds value to us and will to the industry. While I myself am not an avid gamer, I constantly encourage women to enter this industry as I love the art side of it as part of my passion. I emphasize this message at women-focused forums and to aspiring women creators and artists.

The social role of women is evolving in the direction of taking different kinds of professions. So why not in the gaming industry? This is a great career where people can use their imagination without fear and hesitation. However, having more women in the spotlight would help. When we know there are other women we can look up to and learn from, it makes it easier for others to chart a career.

It's important to all the young women who want to work in this industry to understand that if this is your passion, gender isn't a deterrent. I continue to help the dev communities and that is my job and my passion.
