I don't think women need encouragement, there's already so many women who have a deep interest in gaming and particularly in E-sports. Massively competitive personalities already exist amongst women, I think it's just a matter of finding these women who are already performing very well and providing them with resources to help push their careers, similar to what happened with me.

I see women taking on more roles in the gaming space, not just limited to being E-sports athletes or content creators. More towards operations and development roles as well. I believe we are on the right path, the industry is already evolving to be more inclusive. We just need to keep doing what we are doing, which means keep gaming on girls!

Women thinking of a career in gaming should take suggestions from someone in the industry who has more experience with the community. Pursuing a career in gaming can be challenging, so it's important to be persistent to your goals. I would love to encourage more women to become involved in gaming as creators and game development, as gaming needs more women to bring their unique perspectives and talents.

I know that Indian parents did not support their girls so much in gaming, in fact, my parents also, did not support me in starting but I assured them and today they feel proud of me. So you can also face this kind of problem but you should not give up and fight further. Just improve your skills because a lot is going to happen in the Indian gaming industry.

My advice would be to find what you truly are passionate about in gaming. It's very easy to like something at the beginning, but it's super hard to stick to it if it does not excite you. Dip your hands in all kinds of roles in the industry -- streaming, casting, league operations, marketing, game design, coding, content creation are a few examples that I have personally worked in.
