Ambassadors Profile

As a kid, I was always drawn to games. I vividly remember the first time I saw a video game console at a friend's house. The bright colours, the sounds, and the ability to control a character on screen immediately captivated me. From that moment on, I was hooked. My parents weren't particularly fond of video games, so later on my 10th birthday, I received a Playstation 2 as a gift. However, my parents imposed a strict schedule, limiting my playtime to a maximum of two hours per day. Although it was initially frustrating, I eventually realised that the restriction helped me maintain a healthy balance between gaming and other activities. As time passed, my parents noticed how much joy and relaxation gaming brought me. They even began to join in on the fun, creating countless cherished memories that I hold dear to this day. I spent countless hours playing games like WW2, which taught me so much about the history, geography and how weapons were made from scratch which I was always curious about because of my grandfather's military background and the stories that were shared with me. But it wasn't just the educational aspect that kept me interested. I loved the challenge of trying to beat a game and the satisfaction that came with finally succeeding. And as I got older, I began to appreciate the storytelling and artistry that went into creating games. Now, as an adult, I still love gaming. It's a hobby that has been a constant in my life for as long as I can remember, and I'm grateful for the memories and experiences it has given me.
