

Geeks, Gadgets, and Touching Grass

Trekking troubles and muscle aches

In a surprising turn of events, the self-proclaimed office geeks, Dhriti, Manish, Prakrit, and Satvik, embarked on a thrilling adventure to Prabalmachi, leaving their comfort zones behind. These tech-savvy souls traded keyboards for hiking boots and fluorescent office lighting for the warm embrace of nature.

With their faces buried in screens for months on end, the touch of grass felt like a foreign concept. Their awe-struck expressions mirrored that of a toddler discovering their own reflection. Little did they know that their joyous rendezvous with Mother Nature would come at a price - muscle aches that could rival an Olympic weightlifter's post-gym session woes.

As they trudged up the rugged terrain, panting and clutching their aching calves, they couldn't help but marvel at the breathtaking vistas that unfolded before them. The allure of Wi-Fi signals and coding puzzles faded into oblivion as they basked in the sheer beauty of the natural world.

Mithun's electrifying excursion

While the geeks were basking in the wilderness, Mithun set off on a completely different adventure, one filled with tantalising gadgets and tantalising backaches. Computex, the holy grail of consumer electronics festivals, beckoned him to its dizzying array of booths.

Hopping from booth to booth like an over-caffeinated rabbit, Mithun's eyes widened at the sight of the latest gadgets and gizmos. From futuristic VR headsets to state-of-the-art smart home devices, the expo was a playground for his tech-obsessed soul. Fridge magnets and key rings might seem like insignificant trinkets, but for Mithun, they were souvenirs from a realm of innovation and technology. Alas, his overzealous exploration left him with aching feet and a back that yearned for a massage chair worthy of the most discerning office worker.

Satvik's Apple obsession

In the heart of the office, a fierce debate raged on - Android versus Apple. Satvik, the epitome of Apple fandom, saw an opportunity to reinforce his loyalty. He dusted off his Apple watch, a relic buried deep within his drawer, and adorned it on his wrist with an air of superiority.

Jayesh, the resident fitness enthusiast, decided to give the Apple Watch a whirl, hoping it would revolutionise his workout regime. Little did he know that his aspirations transcended the understanding of this miniature technological marvel. The watch diligently tracked his steps and heart rate, but Jayesh's goals extended far beyond mere numbers and notifications. Sensing a duty to showcase Apple's prowess, Satvik became a walking billboard, leaving no Apple product unexplored. From the iPhone to the iPad and now the watch, he was a true devotee. If only his coworkers understood the lengths to which he would go to prove his loyalty to the tech giant.

The Beta hunt continues

As the sun set on another day in the office, Satvik found himself consumed by the virtual world of Counter-Strike. The long-awaited Counter-Strike 2 beta had become an obsession, an itch he couldn't scratch. While his coworkers buzzed with excitement over their own adventures, Satvik was glued to his screen, a devoted spectator in the realm of professional gaming.

Throughout the final Major of CS:GO, held in the romantic city of Paris, Satvik's eyes were fixated on the digital battleground. Match after match, he sat there, his heart pounding

Jayesh Shinde

Bow to me newbs

*drops a 30 bomb in CS

