

BRAKING LATE FOR P1

By Satvik "PA1" Pandey | feedback@skoar.in Every year when a new Formula 1 game comes out, there are two major reactions to the release. There's one group that whines about how it is the same game with a different set of models, and there's another group, which in itself is divided. Still, this group pays actual attention to detail and can actually feel the difference between the changes Codemasters and EA make to the game. This is the case with other sports titles like FIFA as well. I belong to the latter group. And, in the SKOAR! Council, there's only one other human who is with me in this group of F1 fans. He had reviewed the last iteration of the game, and we both had spent hours racing around.

When F1 23 came around, I called shotgun and got playing. As you would have gauged from my leader for this review, I had a love-and-hate relationship with it. There are some inclusions and changes which I couldn't praise enough, and then there were some which I think don't deserve a place in a game like F1 23. So, I kept on penning down all my thoughts and condensed them here. Here you go –

Story

Yes! F1 is back with a story mode, Breaking Point 2, which is the second iteration of the mode, with F1 22 being the first one to have it. Now, I had mentioned earlier that there is a divide between the people who like F1 as well. And, this is where the first cracks form. There are two factions that we have in the community of fans – the traditionalists and the not traditionalists. I am part of the former group that likes pure racing and nothing else.

The second faction is made up of people who love Drive to Survive. Breaking Point 2 gives every person of the second faction a chance to draft their own perfect Drive to Survive storyline. Objectively speaking, this is a massive improvement from last year, with the revised storyline having an actually captivating story. That is all that I can say without spoiling it for you. For a second, even I was hooked. But, snapped back into reality. Because loyalty. Well, if you are loyal to your team in this mode, you get brownie points.

There's F1 World as well. I don't understand why they are doing this,
