

Back in the Saddle

A few months ago, we'd outsourced the Diary to a new writer as part of the now-defunct Digit intergalactic outreach programme. This new writer – whose details are considered confidential, as per Section Zyan KZ-9 Sloathbeck of the Shadow Proclamation – was, in all honesty, not very good at mimicking our vibe. As a result, after a long while, this month's Digit Diary is brought to you by human beings again. Take a couple of minutes for fanfare and delight, then read on!

Beta pass ho gaya

The Beta Chaser has spent a good few days glued to his PC screen. After months of eager waiting and hours of melancholy and painfully loud reevaluations of his existence, the Satvik boy awoke one morning with a notification inviting him to the CS2 beta. This announcement was somewhat sobered down by the fact that Mithun and Jayesh received the same notification; but it's not like Counter-Strike is a competitive game (wait, it is? Uh, nvm). Ever since, It's been CS2 this and CS2 that whenever we're in office. Up to the point when Ali and Dhriti started making nefarious plans to short-out Satvik's PC to maintain office morale. That said, we await in morbid curiosity for when the beta chaser realises that they have no more beta to chase.

The Gate is open

Mithun, Manish and Prakrit have spent as much waking time as their workload allows them to dive into Baldur's Gate 3, which finally made its way out of its multi-year beta. They've started the same campaign at least twice to find the right characters. Though Mithun amused the other two by somehow creating the exact same character from scratch twice. I guess it's safe to say that our fearless leader has a type; and unlike his rather dull Diablo gameplay, this time it's not a spinning barbarian.

Hands high when we flu by

'Tis the season to be sickly, and the flu wave made its way through the Digit offices like people scarf down chakna on a Friday night. For weeks, the sounds of snorting, sniffing and coughing became the norm. Ali slowly started getting frustrated with retakes on videos, and people quite often found themselves slipping on mucous and injuring themselves. It reached breaking point when Mithun sat down on a chair that responded with a soft, disgusting squish. People were soon sent home to quarantine and could only come back to work after nasal tests marked them as snot-free.

The man from Onam

Mithun took his annual leave on Onam this year, and came back with a newfound MasterChef Australia level of criticism of food that isn't Mallu in origin. Understandable, considering all the feasting associated with the festival. It took a few days for him to come off that high horse. Though he still remembers the avial fondly.

BigDaddy is back!

Jayesh, affectionately known as "BigDaddy" in the gaming world, staged an epic comeback.

You see, Jayesh had a legendary gaming past. Back in the day, he was the stuff of office gaming legends, with lightning-fast reflexes and an uncanny ability to take down opponents in any virtual battlefield. But as responsibilities grew, his gaming time dwindled, and his gaming persona seemed to fade into the background. However, a strange phenomenon

Well... That was a nice roll. A nat-20!
