

FALL FROM GRACE

By Mithun "Barbarian_Monkey" Mohandas | feedback@skoar.in

When Blizzard, known for making some of the best video games, announces a new title or a follow-up title in any of their franchises, you can bet your last bullet that it's going to be a good one. Suffice to say that when Diablo IV was announced, high expectations were set. And did they deliver? Hell Yes! And heck no!

The story: Mother returns

To understand the dichotomy of our impression of the game, let's take a look at the different aspects of the game. Blizzard does an excellent job at the single-player campaign. The voice acting is on point. As you venture through the world, you come across countless people who've been displaced because of the invasion of evil forces. You'll no doubt have seen the cinematic trailer a million times by now as I have, so you know that Lilith, one of the lesser evils and daughter of Mephisto, has been broken out from 'The Void'. It's been said that being imprisoned in 'The Void' is a feat worse than death, so you can understand when Lilith feels the need to vent her frustration. Seems like a classic trope. But you gotta remember, this is Blizzard. Their story writers will make you want to side with the Prime Evils or even the lesser evils over your own mother-in-law. However, a lesser evil isn't exactly well-placed to take over the world when much stronger villains such as the Prime Evils exist. If you've played Diablo 3, then you'll remember that you've pretty much kicked all of their rear ends. So the timing couldn't get any better for Lilith.

None of the Prime Evils are around to stop her and the Archangels from heaven rarely bother about the inhabitants of Sanctuary. This gives her a clear path to success, and the only thing that can stop her is ... The Wanderer. That's you, in case you were wondering.

Gameplay: Simple, yet satisfying

Let's just say that when the game launched, Blizzard had a pretty complete game. A lot of different elements that make a Diablo game have been carried forward into Diablo IV but