The significance of the Asia-Pacific region for Sennheiser, a global leader in audio solutions, cannot be overstated. With an ever-evolving business landscape and a diverse array of customer demands, the brand's journey in the Asia-Pacific region has been one of strategic growth and innovation. So, to dive deep into the workings of Sennheiser in India and the Asia-Pacific region as a whole, we sat down with Mr. Petteri Murto, Vice President Sales & Marketing APAC at Sennheiser and spoke about the country's growth potential and its importance in the product development landscape and more.

Asia-Pacific, recognised as a growth driver for businesses worldwide, particularly captivates Sennheiser due to the dynamic markets it encompasses. One of the pivotal steps demonstrating their commitment to this region was establishing the business unit for business communications in 2021, indicating an escalated focus and investments to cater specifically to this market. The development strategy adopted by Sennheiser is deeply rooted in customer insights. Petteri said, “Of course, always the opportunities that are out there and listen to our customers, listen to the feedback that we get from them and make decisions based on what's the what's the demand? What does the customer need in order to get the best possible audio experience?” assuring that the voice of the consumer is something that Sennheiser always keeps in mind when developing products.

Understanding the diverse needs of this densely populated region spanning from Australia to India is crucial. By engaging with end-users, stakeholders, and closely listening to customer feedback, Sennheiser navigates the intricate web of demands to deliver optimal audio experiences tailored to specific markets. “We have everything start and end with customer for us. We talk to people. We interview people. We are out there. We go to end users. We talk to two different stakeholders, everyone in the industry and try to find their point of use to deliver the best possible solutions for them as well,” Petteri added.

The paradigm shift to hybrid work environments posed not only challenges but significant opportunities for Sennheiser. Acknowledging the rising importance of audio in facilitating seamless communication, especially in hybrid work and learning setups, the company saw this as a chance to emphasise its expertise in delivering superior audio solutions. Within the Sennheiser ecosystem, three primary verticals—business communications, professional audio, and consumer products—interact cohesively. Each segment draws from the brand's 78-year history in audio innovation to craft solutions that meet the distinct demands of various settings, be it corporate boardrooms, professional studios, or home office setups. id
