Stylish, very gamer-oriented and eye-catching. The boAt Immortal Katana Blade

TWS earphones were just dropped off at the Digit Test Labs and played around with it to tell you if you should save your money or row, row, row away with the boAt Immortal Katana Blade in your pocket.

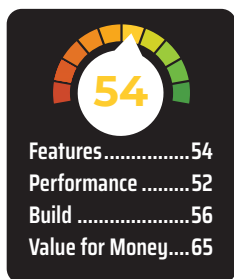

BUILD & DESIGN

Anyone who has seen and held the boAt Immortal Katana Blade TWS will be able to tell you this one fact. boAt has gone all out when it comes to the design of this model. Now that does not mean it is for everyone though. It is a bit over the top and to some, it may even seem gaudy. But it is very much in line with the gamer aesthetic it is going for and young gamers or even kids would like this device.

Well, we say kids would like the Katana Blade but only when it comes to the looks of the charging case. Because the buds are a completely different story. The buds inside do not have any design flair at all and look very basic. They have a stem-style design and no option for silicone ear tips. That would be fine if the solid ear tips were small but the Immortal Katana Blade has enormously bulging ear tips that are definitely not for the small ear canal-ed individuals out there.

The fit is okay. It does not feel overly secure while wearing which would make the more paranoid individuals among us (a.k.a Me) feel constantly worried that the buds would fall off at any time. Because the earbuds are so big, it also means that they do not form a nice seal around the ear to give you good passive noise isolation.

And I personally had a very odd experience with them where the right earbud fit decently well and formed what I would call the bare minimum of a seal. But the Left earbud just would not fit comfortably and felt like it was constantly hanging from my ear canal rather than being wedged in there. That also meant that there was absolutely no noise isolation on my left earbud giving me a pseudo-environmental pass-through, JUST ON MY LEFT EAR!!! Honestly, it was a bit disorientating at first because it felt very unbalanced and made me increase the volume to compensate but when I did that, the right earbud was a bit too loud to be comfortable.

My body abnormalities aside, these earbuds would honestly have fared so much better if they had just added silicone ear tips to give it universal compatibility with all ear types. And that is why these earphones can't be recommended for kids at all.

Okay so now that we have got that rant out of the way, let's get back to the positives of the boAt Immortal Katana Blade which mostly revolve around the way it looks, feels, and how eye-catching it is. The charging case is rectangular and a bit bulky. Not too much but you'd definitely notice it in your pocket and if you are wearing tight pants, it might even feel a bit uncomfortable.

There are 4 RGB LED lights on each of the corners and two more are revealed when you slide up the lid to access the earbuds. The style of the LED lights can be controlled by pressing a button that is placed next to the USB-C charging port. You can also use that button to adjust the sound effect.

Yes, sound effects. Every time you open the slide to get to the earbuds, it makes a swishing sound like a sword being slashed and every time you slide it back into the closed position it makes the sound of a sword being sheathed. You know, because it's called the boAt Immortal "Katana Blade". It makes you wonder though. Why don't the Airdopes have themed sound effects as well?

FEATURES & PERFORMANCE

Considering the reasonable price, the boAt Immortal Katana Blade is not what you would call sparse in terms of the features it has on offer. It has USB-C ASAP Charging, a claimed 50 hours of playtime and Bluetooth v5.3.

In terms of the battery life, I have been using the earphones for about an hour a day for the last 5 days without topping them up and they are still going just fine. boAt also claims that
