After launching two headphones in February, Sennheiser has launched their third pair of headphones in India, the Sennheiser Accentum Headphones. They are an addition to their consumer grade headphones lineup, joining in the HD BT headphones, the Momentum headphones, and their closest sibling, the Accentum Plus headphones. I had reviewed the Sennheiser Accentum Plus headphones in February, so, when these headphones, bearing an uncanny resemblance to their Plus sibling came into the Digit Test Centre, I decided to pit them against each other to find out how the Sennheiser Accentum is different from the Plus variant, and does it offer better value for your money at ₹14,990. Let's find out –

Build and Design

From the time you open the box, you will notice that Sennheiser has stuck to a similar design with the Accentum Headphones as they did with the Accentum Plus, which draws a lot from its more expensive cousin, the Momentum 4 headphones. The only noticeable differences in the design are on the earcups, the buttons and the branding on the headband. The earcups have a small groove running around the circumference on the Plus and the Sennheiser logo on the Accentum Plus has a metallic finish to it. The Accentum headphones have ore buttons on the side, stepping in for the touch controls which we found on the Accentum Plus. The fit is equally great as the Accentum Plus and the cushioning on the headband and the earcups also matches up the high standards set by the Accentum Plus in the sub ₹20,000 range.

The materials used in the construction of both the headphones are identical and sturdy. The Sennheiser Accentum Headphones managed to pass our signature creak test, where we put the headphones through a very thorough stress test to see if the materials make any sound or not, with flying colours. Coming to the last thing that you will notice when you get your hands on the Accentum Headphones, is that there is no carrying case in the box. Sennheiser has reserved that for the Accentum Plus. Now, keep in mind the ₹5,000 price difference between the headphones. You are still getting a lot of value with the Accentum headphones when compared to the Accentum Plus, in my opinion.

In this part, there is a clear winner for me. It is the Accentum headphones. They sport a design that screams class, finish that matches up to the best headphones in the price range, and a fit that will suit most people out there. The markup that you will pay for the Accentum Plus, does pull it down a bit, in this section. But, there are three more sections left.
