WHEN THE GEEKS SHARE THEIR WAYS OF DETOX

MANISH RAJESH

The goal is to dial back on screen time. Slowly cutting down on doomscrolling and gaming every day. Getting into analog hobbies like drawing or playing music, feels kinda refreshing. Making a point to hang out with friends in person, no screens involved. It's all about finding that balance and enjoying the real world a bit more.

DHRITI DATTA

Stepping away from the chaos of tech and social media from time to time is essential for my mental well-being. However, it can be rather hard to do, given how connected the world is through tech. My idea of a digital detox is visiting a destination that's very familiar to me so I can focus on myself and disconnect from all social apps temporarily. I ensure that the destination is one I've been to multiple times so I don't feel the urge to update my social media during this time I've carved out for me.

SATVIK PANDEY

While working with tech, it is hard to find time away from it. But with a dedicated exercise regime and a fixed sleep schedule which minimises my time out of office, helps me keep my time spent with tech in check. Also, I have disabled all social media notifications apart from WhatsApp. So, that is also a big help in getting time away from tech.

AYUSHI JAIN

When I want to escape tech overwhelm, I head outside for a walk! Fresh air is my favorite detox. No notifications, just me, my thoughts, and nature's chill vibes. It feels nice to disconnect, recharge, and remind myself there's a world beyond the digital realm.

DEEPAK SINGH

Digital detox is relatively easier for me because I'm not addicted to shorts or very active on social media, and my eager kid keeps nudging me to play together on weekends. Still, every day I make a conscious effort to stay away from all my gadgets. I go for a morning walk with my wife, do some meditation, and often make time to read a book.
