

Samsung, oh Samsung

You are a winner

Boo-Man | boo@digit.in

*Samsung, oh Samsung,
What have you done?
Copying Apple, you have again begun,
With Galaxy AI, you led the charge,
And made a difference with the Buds,
But back to square one, you have returned.
People call the Buds3 and the Watch Ultra
Apple's clones,
But remember, you are not alone,
Boo-Man stands with you,
In this fight against the world.
I mock Apple,
But I will stand with you,
Because standing against the world is what I do.*

— #NotAGreatPoet, Boo-Man

Given my absence from the magazine for the last couple of months, you thought that I was done, then you're wrong. I was never gone. I was simply re-juicing and preparing for an occasion just like this. While watching Samsung's Unpacked event, I was applauding them for most of its announcements, and I thought, "Oh! They took inspiration from Apple and are invading their space, rather, are providing their Android compatriots viable alternatives to Apple's products." Then, I went on to the internet. People across the board were trashing Samsung for "copying" Apple's AirPods and their Watch Ultra. But why give Samsung the flak?

All of you Android users cry that companies are not innovating like Apple. You want a seamless ecosystem, which Apple has. You want to get rid of the Green bubble, but Apple won't budge. You asked for AirDrop and got a Quick Share. The companies are trying and leading in terms of innovation, too! Apple has fallen behind in more ways than one, and Android folk are trying to maintain the lead. And, they would, if not for you crying menaces. You start Reddit threads against the same companies that save you from entering the walled garden of Apple. But, when someone like Samsung comes forth and provides you with viable alternatives to Apple without making you empty your wallets, you crib and cry. WHY?

By the looks of it, what Samsung did with the Galaxy Watch Ultra is amazing! And the Buds3 and Buds3 Pro, if they are able to replicate the magic of the Galaxy Buds 2 Pro, then I am sure you have a winner on your hands. Let these unapologetic and ungrateful folks come at you for having "copied" Apple's products. I am sure these are the same people who ask ChatGPT to write their "original" code.

"Copying" a brand is something that is taken as a very backwards move by the ever-salty tech community on the internet. If there are more players in the same space, THERE WILL BE INNOVATION! And, the costs will go down. I am sure Mr Tim Apple would not budge, and will come up with some quirky one-liner touting Apple's horns for being the company whose innovations are always the best, and with every launch, they launch the insert superlative (mostly best-ever) product, every time they take to the stage. Stay in your ball-pit of absurdly overpriced products,

"Samsung really likes to do a weird thing where they have something good and unique going for a while and then completely ditch it and copy Apple."

@loffyy via YouTube/Dave2D/Samsung Fold 6 and Flip 6 - The Good and The Bad

Boo-Man: I don't see anything wrong here. As they say – "In every competition, there are no winners or losers, only learners."

wipe your tears with the ₹1,900 microfiber cloth and milk the blind fanboys who cannot help but flock to your glass boxes, which you call Apple Stores. And, if you, the person reading this, are going to come at me, be prepared. I am well rested and ready. 😊