

Tropical Twists and Changes...

Just when we thought October would usher in some predictable peace at the Digit Test Centre, fate had other ideas. Between Hawaiian beaches, automotive alliances, mysterious mood shifts, and a few unexpected tech triumphs, it's been a whirlwind. Here's a peek into a very "ordinary" month around here.

Hawaiian pilgrimage

It all kicked off when Jayesh, was "dispatched" to Qualcomm's annual summit—held, as luck would have it, in Hawaii. Apparently, there's no better place to dissect the latest mobile processing advances than on sun-drenched beaches. We watched his updates come in with a mixture of envy and amusement: a steady stream of beachy selfies, scenic shots, and a token conference hall photo to keep up appearances. His emails with Snapdragon insights arrived at dawn, presumably between surfing sessions, as we sat in our Mumbai office, groggily sipping coffee and squinting at his reports. Not exactly the escape we'd envisioned for ourselves, but hey, at least one of us is living the dream.

Shifting gears

If we're being honest, there's now a palpable vroom in the air. The excitement is real—even if it does mean extra late-night deadlines as we try to juggle automotive reviews, buying guides, and hands-on comparisons with our already-packed tech calendar. Somewhere in between all the extra work, though, we're truly pumped to have a new lane in the magazine.

Farewell Darab

But it's not all fun and games. Darab, our resident sage and source of endless coffee break laughter, said goodbye to the Test Centre. His desk, which had once been a shrine to everything from random gadgets to half-written notes and countless coffee mugs, now sits hauntingly empty.

The MacOS saga

And then there's Prakrit, whose MacOS transition has become our favourite office soap opera. One unsuspecting day, he arrived to find his old PC replaced by a sleek Mac Studio. His rants about missing right-click and botched keyboard shortcuts became a daily source of entertainment. Every other hour, he'd either be marvelling at the minimalist interface or lamenting the steep learning curve. For those of us watching, it's a drama worth tuning into.

Mumbai meets Tokyo

In the midst of all the tech mayhem, the team treated themselves to an escape of their own. After a particularly hectic week, we headed to Kuuraku, a Japanese eatery in Bandra. For a moment, we swapped screens for sushi and took our taste buds on a mini-vacation. Mithun, ever the bold eater, was first to dive into the sashimi platter while the rest of us gingerly sampled tempura and miso soup. Between mouthfuls of ramen, we shared laughs, swapped tales of product reviews gone wrong, and momentarily forgot about our looming deadlines.

To top it off, nostalgia hit hard when Satvik caught up with Milind Soman, the cover star of Digit's second-anniversary issue, at an event. Satvik seized the opportunity to show him the vintage cover, a reminder of how far we've come. There was a quiet pride in the room, a collective realisation of Digit's legacy—and the many chapters still to come. d
