

If used correctly, search engines can be your child's source of clean fun within the next few months. Given the central role of Google as the search engine starting point for almost everyone, it makes sense that the company is engaging with children. While child-oriented “safe search engines” already exist in the form of KidRex and GoGooligans, the majority still resort to Google Search as the default option. Google’s announcement of developing and releasing kid-oriented services such as email, search and video is good news for parents. It remains to be seen how deep Google will invest in more mainstream e-learning products but it does work as a lightening rod for other companies to do the same. This means more options for parents as they look to help their child achieve their highest potential.
