

KidsReads

The KidsReads website has a very simple agenda - to get kids reading. The website works as a friendly “goodreads” for kids where age appropriate content is available. A variety of information such as author details, book titles, interviews, contests and stories are available to browse. Its a great place for kids to discover what book they would like to read next and also give their own feedback. The website benefits from parental involvement as it gives them all the information they need about a book their child may be reading or wants to read.

Fun Brain

Another fun and educational website is Fun Brain which is chock full of cleverly educational games and activities. The website offers math oriented and reading games, as well as a host of reading options for young children. The games are designed to impart valuable mathematical and vocabulary lessons to kids while being fun and polished. Kids can even find brand name stories such as Diary of a Wimpy Kid and known comic strips for some relaxed fun.

PARENTAL CONTROL AND SUPERVISION

If you’ve read this far, good job! We can safely assume that you really care about the well-being of your child. If you’ve skipped to this part, shame on you. Go back and read the whole thing. There are no shortcuts to parenting.

That said, let’s look at 10 tips on how to best ensure that your tot can safely explore their gadgets:

1. We’ll reiterate what we said earlier: tech should simply be an extension to learning, never a replacement. Avoid using the device as a reward, lest you reinforce the belief that these tools are simply toys, when in fact they’re portals to a world of knowledge, collaboration and insight.
