

monetary) with the user's goals, and as such it should be included in the project as early as possible, right from creating the business model. It is an iterative and continuous process that never really ends and will help in making changes every step of the way.

9. White space is wasted space.

Hardly any artists leaves a portion of his canvas blank. However, on the internet, it is a different story. White space is powerful, it is a strong framing tool. It gives a sense of space, and can be used to direct attention to relevant text and pictures. It is "an active element, not a passive background." to quote Jan Tschichold. Use white space to enhance your visual layout and position your brand.

UX Design shall set you free

As of now, UX design is just about beginning to sound like black magic. However, it is even better than black magic, because UX design isn't only about design for technological products and digital interfaces. UX design can be applied to anything in life, just like quantum mechanics, and we aren't even kidding. In quantum mechanics, like in life, everything is uncertain. There are many possibilities, until we measure a particle to obtain an outcome. The important part is that the outcome of the measurement also depends crucially on the basis taken for the measurement, which is chosen by the observer (you). To put it simply, the observer plays a major part in how reality forms, and that applies to life as well. Similarly, you can use UX design in just about any facet of your life that involves other people interacting with something you made. All you have to do is get into the mind of the other person (the user) and try to imagine the world from their perspective, though that is much easier said than done. You can even user test over time by trying out different variations and noting which gets the best results. You can apply UX design to your homework, your presentations, your CV (curriculum vitae), or even to your personality if you're being particularly ambitious. Be warned, that would also mean changing your personality according to what you want other people to feel when they interact with you. In essence you are manipulating your Self just to manipulate others' perception of you. Though you aren't radioactive (hopefully), be careful you don't decay! Puns aside, even if you aren't a UX designer, you can learn the tools and techniques in this Fast Track and apply them in your life. Here is a way to use UX to slightly mess with