

Make sure they aren't variations on the same persona personas by cross-referencing. For example, a persona with a “light” current weight will, of course, not be looking to lose a LOT of weight, and so “light” current weight wouldn’t match with a high “intended weight loss”. Get the gist?

If a few (2-3) primary personas don’t cover most of your target audience, you begin creating secondary ones, but first make sure the primary ones are good! They should be absolutely believable and indistinguishable from real people for those who didn’t know better. Unless the persona feels like a real person, you and your team won’t be able to develop adequate empathy. Add a memorable name and an apt photo for your persona in the deliverable document, similar to the way you’d create a profile. The profile should NOT have unnecessary details, like the name and breed of their fictional pet dog, unless it’s relevant to the intended use of the product. Don’t modify
