

Mental Model for Situational Awareness

the persona to make the design process easier. For best results, make the persona fit the characteristics (from your research) and then make the design fit the persona. Most importantly, different personas should have different personalities, like different people! Not “Fat Alice” and “Thin Alice”. Yeah, you get the gist...

Fun with personas

Role-playing

Think of the personas as real people, but also as your dolls, for whom you’re building your doll house. There’s so much you can do using your cast of personas. In fact, you can use them just about everywhere! Even in the real world to find real people for user-testing.

Mainly though, they’re meant to guide your design process. Create a storyboard (i.e. a visual interpretation of a scenario) starring your primary personas, and you’ll see how your product/service fits into this persona’s life. Create various scenarios that might occur in the day-to-day life of your personas. Doing this may help you identify new design challenges and product features. Have a lot of ideas for features already? Throw them at your personas, imagining how they would use these features (and if they’d even want to) in order to hone in on the essentials. Evaluate, test and prioritise designs by having your personas interact with them, keeping in mind these end users’ needs, abilities and habits. If it’s too difficult to do all