

A rather daring invention for its time, the invention probably had for its inspiration the portable devices such as the Sony Walkman which had already become an icon by then. The fact that television and movies had a potentially wider audience than music might have been an influence too.

The sneaker phone in the 1990s

Looking like something that was born in the imagination of Ian Fleming when he was super-drunk, the sneaker phone made a splash during the

Really, words fail

1990s in America. However, the product didn't cause any wide-spread ripples in the market, possibly due to its clunky nature. The fact that sneakers were THE accessory of choice for the urban young might have prompted such an invention, though apparently even the experimental fashionistas of American cities found this one way over the top.

Levis ICD+ jacket in 2000

Levis- the brand that's single-handedly responsible for making the denim the choice attire of the young was also the first to inculcate wearable tech

Cool looks with hot technology into their garment. The piece of clothing in question is the Levis ICD+ jacket which was introduced in summer 2000. Meant for young professionals, the jacket was created in collaboration with Philips and came in four styles.

The basic idea was to have a removable wired harness which one could connect to portable electronic devices- including mobile phones and MP3 players. All the devices would be connected to a central control module using which the wearer could easily switch between devices. Appealing both aesthetically and on a utilitarian front, Levis' jacket