

where ‘Experience Creator’ is a job title that’s hardly sound legit, let alone cool, that’s saying a lot.

The company has already brought out Theblu which is one of the core HTC Vive demos. Another notable project to their name is Virtual Brainload- a project they finished in conjunction with another company, Adult Swim. The company is currently working to create a content ecosystem for virtual reality. To this end they give a million dollar grant fund for VR content creators. Exciting times, these...

7. High Fidelity

High Fidelity is the name of a movie. For those who haven’t seen it, it’s highly recommended (so is the novel which it is based on). High Fidelity is also the name of a San Francisco based company that aims to do something creative in the VR segment: their idea is to build and “open source deployable worlds” for VR, which is essentially a distributed network of virtual worlds High Fidelity aims to achieve this by using user contributed devices.

It looks like the kind of place where games, creative applications, socialization and education all could have a field day.

8. Nod Labs

Nod Labs is focused on creating input devices for virtual reality. They purportedly have three major products lined up, called the Backspin, the Nod