

maybe by making the wrong remarks, pulling it apart). But the fact remains that by engaging continually with someone on social media, we are still expending time for that particular relationship, showing that we value the relation.

Where it's seen:

Coca-Cola, being “the most recognisable brand in the world” certainly knows a thing or two about building good relationships with customers. And even though they have been around for over a century, they haven't lost the knack in the digital age as well. Take the ‘Share a Coke’ campaign that they first rolled out in Summer, 2013 in the UK. The brand substituted the company logo on the bottle with the most popular English names. The idea—due to its personal connect with the people, made more than a ripple in social media, so much so that Coke went ahead and made it possible for people with less common names to create the labels. What made the campaign tick is the simplest of all rules in a good relationship—showing that you care about the other person, at times more than yourself. By foregoing their brand name from the bottle and bringing a person's name there, Coke illustrated this point rather well.

Coca-Cola is a master of personalizing content

4. To promote brands / causes that you believe in Values are inculcated in a person over a long period of time, starting with the childhood days when values are passed down from the parents and other adults around you. And over the years, we develop an attitude by which we almost instinctively back any causes or brands that seem to carry the same values. Also, we naturally form an inclination to share stories about these brands and causes with as many people as we can, in an effort at proselytizing, if you will.

Where it's seen:

There are certain simple things that we take for granted, like the fact that it's relatively easy for us to get a pair of shoes for ourselves. However, there are literally millions around the globe who go barefoot every day, possibly
