

can spread the message for you-provided the message is appealing enough for them to share.

A research conducted by the University of Pennsylvania defined the emotion that makes a user share the content with others(yes, they did!). And it goes like this-”[an] emotion of self-transcendence, a feeling of admiration and elevation in the face of something greater than the self.” Clearly, a tall order for a particular type of content. But the point is that one must try to land on such points in the customer’s emotional landscape if s/he is to create content that resonates well with them, and more importantly- make them share it with others.

Where it worked:

There’s something about the pictures of sweet-oozing confectionaries and related products which make us not just drool over them but share them with friends, prompting more drooling from more salivary glands.

And what sweeter a way to connect with each other? The brand, Cinabbon tapped into this aspect of human behaviour on social platforms when they launched their Snapchat account. The brand not only had two influencers take over the account but also asked fans to share pics of sweets. This made the account THE page to visit if you wanna drool over the snaps others have shared. In other words, the brand made it possible for the audiences to share their snaps with a wider population, and you can be sure that with over 2,000 followers added in just two days, it was Cinnabon who took the cake!

2. Tell a story

The thing is, we are a storytelling(and story devouring) animal. We understand the world around us through stories. A story is an progression of sequentially connected units and it’s by using such sequences that we relate even the mundane happenings of our life to others(first I went to the bank, then to the supermarket where I bumped into Trisha who invited me to a movie...). This simple insight can be put to use in social media communi-
